Shred-it wants to help you to know which documents to shred and which to keep.

These days, most businesses are required by law to retain confidential client information, along with employee or company data, for a minimal amount of time. But many types of documents eventually outlive their purpose, and holding onto them too long puts you at risk of a security breach and non-compliance with today's privacy legislation.

How long you store business records should be determined by a retention schedule that balances each record's usefulness with the legal requirements. To some degree, this will depend on your type of business, and the lifecycle of specific documents. You'll want to determine a retention schedule for each type of document, and then create a secure destruction schedule for those documents to reduce risks associated with data breaches.

From a risk-management perspective, once you've agreed on a time period to retain each type of document, the only acceptable way to discard your documents is to make sure they're irreversibly destroyed. Shredding is a legal requirement for many types of documents, and on site shredding is the safest policy. You'll want a Certificate of Destruction that specifies the exact date and method used to destroy your documents.

To help you create the right retention schedule for your business, here's a list of documents that contain confidential information, along with the recommended retention period for each type in accordance with certain legal requirements. These recommendations on document retention are general guidelines only. They are not intended to represent legal advice. Contact your legal expert(s) or federal, state or provincial government to ensure you are following current legal requirements for your area.
